CHAPTER XVII. The old castle of Donoyle grows out of of modern architects, but planned and built by a soldier race as their city of refuge, it had watched the tide of feudal wars storm by, and remained uncovered by the tides of English conquest. Turning grayer with every century, where the ivy could not reach it, it had grown to look like a mass of bowlders in a world of woods.

In a room of this castle, which overlooked the river, Lady Donoyle and her daughter were sitting at breakfast one morning about a year from the time Vandraken had made his party call. "Paddy, the post, is late again to-day," observed Lady Donoyle.

"It is very poetical, dear. As the French general remarked, apropos of the charge Vandraken let the paper flutter to the of Balaklava, It is grand, but it is not war.' Of course, the flowers come in very case the very thing I have done! These things must be in the air, unless von Tarsenheim has been in the habit of talking about his invention. Perhaps he has."
